LEE LIBRARY (Room #16) DATE TAKEN: 06.24.16 POLITICAL SCIENCE & NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS WHAT IS POLITICAL SCIENCE? The study of political science is the systematic study of the behavior of groups, organizations, nations, and their governments. Political science is not only the study of governments; it is also the study of the forces that lead to the creation, preservation, and change of governments. In a sense, political science is an extension of sociology which, in turn, is the study of the structures of human society. Political science, in turn, studies the social structures of human societies. WHY IS THE STUDY OF POLITICAL SCIENCE IMPORTANT? Studying the forces and forces that create and maintain the government is important because our political structures reflect the values and beliefs of the society in which they are created. This means that our current political structures are a reflection of who we are as a people and the values that we share. If we change our values and beliefs, we will create and maintain a different kind of political structure. In today's world, political science can be divided into two main categories, the liberal side and the conservative side. In the liberal side, political scientists analyze and criticize the characteristics of liberal societies and governments. The liberal side has three broad categories, classical liberalism, pluralism, and social liberalism. It is common for political scientists to make observations about the type of government that exists in a particular society and to give recommendations about how to change the government in that society. For instance, political scientists criticize government when they are unable to live up to their rhetoric or promise to their people. The conservative side emphasizes the importance of the state to protect the rights and the well-being of individuals. The major principle of the conservative side is the nation-state. It is important to understand the distinction between the nation and the state because the nation and the state are not the same. Nations are composed of many different nations, while the state is composed of 82157476af
